All in her best she was arrayed.
For John was her first suitor:
He swore she was as "oute as ilo-Perhaps a little outer!" That is, unto himself he swore, For ne'er a word was spoken: They sat for three good hours or more, And slience was unbroken.

Her little heart went pit a-pat, And he felt dreadful queery; He scratched his head and brust Yet spoke not to his deary.

The ribbons which adorned her bair, He looked at and admired; The crimson on her cheeks so fair, With love his heart inspired.

He hem'd and haw'd, and tried to speak.

For he was growing bolder:

But still his courage was too weak—

"His love he never told her."

Impatiently did Dolly wait

For him to speak unto her.
Until 'twas growing rather late—
And thus did Johnny woo her.

At length his Dolly fell asleep, And John thought he'd be going— "I guess I'il go and feed them sheep So ended John's first wooing.

LEOLA;

THE MYSTERIOUS RANGER

A Tale of the Mexican War.

By T. Hamilton Vananda Author of " Allela," " The Miller Patrict," " Wild Hermil," " Almont," " Jessie Wharton," etc. "Carramba !" cried the merchant. But no sooner was the donkey dismantled, and the soldlers engaged in their rough sport, than he sprang upon the beast's back with the agility of a youth, and dashed away towards Mon-"What does that mean?" cried Charley, who was quick of suspicion. "Let us examine

He seized hold of them, and after a close inspection of their formation, he took out his pocket-knife, and cutting a slit through the inside bottom, he took therefrom a package of

"Ha, ha!" he cried, as the rest gathered around bir, unmindful any longer of the oranges, "Who says there's nothing but oranges grow in Mexico? Tim, I think you've made the best catch you ever made in your life."

He preceded to open the package and inspect its contents. Some of the papers were directed to General Santa Anna, one to La Senorita Cos, and one to the Senor Eduardo Cas-"What!" exc'aimed Charley. "Has that old villain left bis old field and gone into regular quarters? He's the scoundrel that finished off those brave Texans that tried to save that beautiful Senora. I knew one of them-her lover, Travis-and I've always sworn that if ever I met with th's Castillias, I'd revenge Travis' death. I don't know that old "Rough and Ready" has any business with any of there dispatches, save those for Santa Anna. So, boys, if you'll sing n um, I'il read the rest to you." 'Mum's the word!" cried the men, who were anxious to hear the dispatches. Charley proceeded very leisurely to break open the one addressed to the Bandit Chief, and glanced over it in silence. He then uttered a low whistle, indicative of surprise.

"Well, if ever I heard of such d-d villainy he exclaimed "What do you think of this, and he proceeded to read as follows :

"Sefor Eduardo,
"I have been to your castle and had a long interview with the Newral... In. She seems, however, to gain fresh hope of a revene, as the Americanes advance. I think it would be advisable to remove her to some convent, for fear that during your absence, some of the countes' incursions might reach the Hacienda de Custillus, and overnower it. I will await your orders. She utterly refuse to tell me what her father has done with the papers of the estate. By the way, I have gaired some clue to the identity of that young Texan, het lover, whom you have prisoner in Monterey, and if I am right, he is most dangerous to us both. Suppose he were to die quietly in his prison, it would save all further trouble. It can easily be done; I will be in the city as soon as the siege is decided. "Señor Eduardo,

THE GRAY MONK."

"Then Travis is not dead," said Tom Clayton, as soon as the exclamations of revolt and horror had been uttered by the men.

"No, and it strikes me that, by upsetting that pannier I have saved his life. For if the General carries out his plan of attack, those of us who survive will be lu Monterey in less than a week, and well take mighty good care to release our comrades from their loathsome prison," said Langford.

"What is in the other letter, Charley?" asked

"Oh, this is to Senorita Cos. A love-letter, ! suppose, though, if I mistake not, I have heard her mentioned as a secret spy of both church and State. You remember what grand fetes she used to give in Matamoras ?" "Yes, let us hear the letter. That will probably explain."

"Senorita" - began Charley -

"Senorita"— began Charley—
"My efforts to get at the property have, as yet, proved fruitless. I have been to Castillias' Hacienda, and endeavored to indice the Senora Leols to go to the convent, but she seems to have lost her repugnance to her captor. Such is the fickleness of woman. You probably know that Eduardo is in the city, where I hope you arrived safe. Beware how far your jealousy, or imagined wrong should drive you, or the curse of the churc's be upon you! Eduardo will yet do you justice. If your woman's wit could plan some way to put Leola's lover out of the world, you would do me a great fayor. He is in the prison of San Sebastiano. You will soon see THE GRAY MONK."

"The devil she will!" ejaculated Langford. *Most probably before she sees this letter. But I wish I knew the locality of this Bandit's Ha-

"I wish so too," said Clayton. "For if it i anywhere within twenty miles, we would rescue that girl before we would move a peg forwards, "That we would!" cried the volunteers.

"Here, Tim," said Charley. "You take this letter to the quarters of the Texan Rangers, and let them know that brave Travis isn't dead, while I go to the General with these dispatches." The friends separated upon their missions, leaving their comrades to talk over what they

THE PR SONERS. HOPE, FRIENDS. On the east side of the city of Monterey, looming dark and gloomy, like a towering battlement above the small stream which skirts the hill, is a large stone building of powerful construction, with grated windows, and projecting wings and ts, reminding one more of the descriptions of the Bastile, than, perhaps, any other structure in the world. This is the Castle di Schastiane, or prison for political offenders, which, from the usual insurrectionary state of the country, is nost universally full, and demands a strong evere, and many a poor American felt its sterr regime, prior to the capture of Monterey. The prisoners are usually confined in close cells during the day and night, with the exception of an hour in the morning, and one at evening, when they are permitted to walk in couples on small balconies, which overlook the inner

It was the evening following the one which closed the last chapter, when a tall, rough-look-ing man, with prominent features, grey eyes, a long, coarse board, and dressed in a dilapidat nunter's garb, from which the fringe had been torn, walked out of his cell upon the west side of the building, and saning over the railing, looked moodily down upon the court, where several soldiers in the Mexican uniform were lounging and goesiping in their own language.

The cell from which he had emerged, was in mediately over the great gate-way, or entranc, and the gallery extended round it to a grated window, which looked out upon a large square of the town. After looking down upon the court for some moments, he turned away with an air of disgust, at the specimen of soldiery there exhibited, and strolled carelessly round the gallery, he looked through the grated window out upon the large square, where a regiment of soldiers were drilling.

He had not been there long, when looking down among the idlers that lined the square, be discovered a young man, apparently eighteen or twenty, and a Mexican, who was looking very hard up at his grate, and no sooner caught his glance, than he made him a sign. "Wonder what that ere 'can mean?" said the man, who was none other than our o'd friend. Kit Galen.

The young man gradually withdrew himself from the throng, and strolled nearer the pris-

"'t seems to me, I hey seed that ere face afore," mutt r.d Kit, "though I may be mistaken, I reckon. He evidently wants to hold a confab with his humble sarvint, for he draws this way. Wal, I ain't pertickler, for I aren't talked to anybody for nigh on to about three months, ony the Leftenant, an' he's got so dispirited now, that he won't talk any more."

"Hist!" said the youth, who had now drawn close under the building, and with his gaze apparently fixed on the so'diers, spoke in a low

"What is it, youngster?" asked Kit, imitating his cautious tone. "Lie down on your gallery, and listen," said the youth.

"There we are," replied Kit, stretching him self upon the gallery, and applying his ear to the

"Is the young American officer alive yet?" asked the low voice, though he could no longer see its owner.

"Yes," whispered the ranger. "And well?" "Yes."

"Tell him that the army to which you belong will attack the city to-morrow." "Indeed!"

"Tell him, if they conquer, and he is set free that the Senora Leola is a prisoner in the Hacienda di Castillias, situated in the Engendelta Pass, fifteen miles West of the city. There will be one at the southern gate who will show him the way, on the first night after his liberation." "Thank'ee!" said Kit, with a swelling heart and choking voice. "Who are you that takes sich an interest in us?" "That need not be known, but it is one who serves the Senora Leola," said the mysterious "But I'd rather know yer name, case ye mought be foolin', you know," persisted Kit. The young man stepped out from the wall, glanced cautiously around, and then lifting her closely fitting cap from her her head, said.

Kit peered through the grate, and his eyes dilated with surprise. The straight black hair of the youth was parted in the centre, and tucked up evenly around. He at once recognized the face, as soon as the cap was lifted. "You sre-" limbs, I recken," exclaimed the ranger, spring ing to his feet. "I declare to gracious, thar's ome sense in these greasers anyhow! But, no, she and the Senora Leola don't belong to the tribe, they got 'ere by some mistake; some revolution of catur. By hookey! if I ever git out o' this war with a whole skin, I'll marry that are gal. But I must go in and tell Jules the Entering the low, dingy cell, he saw Travis, pale and emaciated, sitting upon a large block of stone, his brow knit, and his gaze fixed upon the floor. It was a wretchedly filthy place, and had worked a powerful change upon that noble, manly form. His eyes were sunken, and emitted a fierce, wild light; his ur shaven face was haggard, while his whole frame seemed shriveled.

"What's the matter now?" he said, almost fiercely, as looking up suddenly on Kit's abrupt entrance, he saw the gleam of pleasure in his

by the arm with the gripe of a vice. "Thar! that'll do; yer needn't gripe it any lighter, thankee," said Kit, wincing. "I'm so weak from starvation, like yerself, yer see, that wouldn't care 'bout fightin' a Catamount now, nor even a Kermanshee."

"For Heaven's sake! tell me what you have heard!" cried Travis, hoarsely, as he slowly relaxed his hold.
